THE BIRTH FAMINE: IF NO CHILDREN, THEN NO FUTURE

BY MICHAEL CHARLES MASTER PDF

Since the 1970s, birth rates in the United States have taken a plunge, yet our population continues to climb. Our census agencies cleverly hide the damning truth behind inflated statistics based on immigrant births. The frightening reality is simple: native-born American citizens are not having enough children to replace themselves.

How has this trend damaged American society over the last four decades, and what does it mean for our future? In The Birth Famine, Michael Charles Master expounds on past mistakes and current crises while offering ways to reverse terrifying trends. Through meticulous research and common sense reasoning, Master reveals the insidious effects of the birth famine on our economy, political system, and family dynamics. He exposes the brutal truth about the ramifications of unchecked immigration. Without mincing words or cowing to political correctness, Master skewers a materialistic modern American culture that values goods over family.

While The Birth Famine is a wake-up call for all Americans, Master reminds us that it's not too late. Readers will find hope in Master's sensible and feasible solutions. By encouraging our government and citizens to put family first, we can reinvigorate our nation's economy, political landscape, and, most importantly, the American spirit.

Michael Master sees it plain as day: children are our future, not immigrants.

By Walter Mitty

Michael Master sees the problem as plain as day: children are our (American) future, not immigrants.

This is the author's third book and it is his spot-on best.

I have known the author for almost a decade at this point. Michael is a savvy businessman, a brilliant technologist and he loves his country more than most Americans can possibly imagine. He talks to people. He argues with ideological opponents. But he does it as a fellow human being created in the image of God and it is that basic respect that makes his apologia, indeed his argument, carry weight.

In "The Birth Famine" Michael argues that Americans have been cheated of their own progeny. How could anyone maintain otherwise? He lays the blame squarely on the shoulders of his own generation, more specifically the college-educated Baby Boomers that went on to change the world in a way they hadn't quite intended.

You see, on the way to having it all, which is essentially a juvenile preoccupation, Boomers forgot to reproduce themselves. By the time they figured it out, it was more or less too late as their bio-clocks expired. So their parents did what Boomer parents always did: they used their wealth and influence to pay Junior's way out of trouble, this time somewhat self-servingly but none the less by "outsourcing" the grandchildren they didn't have to the cheap and compliant Third World nations of Mexico and Latin America and elsewhere.

This "fix" came at a steep cost. First of all, who really gives a damn about the other guy's kids? I mean really? Secondly, does anyone expect those kids -- or their mamas and papas -- to give a damn about America, from Plymouth Rock to Valley Forge to Gettysburg to Apollo 11?

No, of course not. This generational cuckolding (so named for the cuckoo birds that perfected the trick) was seen as a simple business transaction by the Boomers and their parents but for the rest of us -- those that were never consulted in the first place -- it represents the complete betrayal of almost everything we hold dear. You see, for us "everyone else" our fathers and our fathers' fathers mean something. Our culture means something. Our history means something. Our legacy means something and it means more than cheap lawn mowers and a band-aide over the yawning Social Security finance chasm.

Adding insult to injury, these ersatz children and grandchildren do not resemble the historic American nation in any way. One marvels that a people should apply the dehumanized concept of "mass produced, interchangeable parts" to living, breathing human beings but that is precisely what we have been asked to swallow by the Ruling Class that imposed this situation on us some thirty years ago.

Making the Point

Michael presents his case for this in a clear and easily followed style. He uses logic. He excerpts discussions held with friend and foe to give full weight to all sides of the debate. He of course has facts and evidence, sometime from surprising sources, to buttress what would otherwise be an extravagant claim. Michael argues by analogy, which allows even non-believers to acknowledge his point of view as the same argument is presented in parallel ways from a Christian perspective, from a spiritual/karmic viewpoint and finally from an atheistic, evolutionary perspective that speaks in stark terms about the harsh requirements a species must satisfy to survive.

All three converge on the same point, adding credibility to each in turn: the West is dying of its own selfishness, subsequent to placing momentary distractions ahead of our core purpose of procreation, almost as though the trinkets and silly competitions are a distraction from the existential horror of personal extinction which is, of course, the only possible destiny for the selfishly childless. The implications for the homosexual movement are equally clear and self-evident for the stridency involved. I can't but hope Michael will include apologica nad sanctification to the unintentionally childless not only from their Christian mission of caring for their families with thier unallocated resources, but also from the emerging realization of the Ethnic Genetic Interest theory that posits childless persons further the survival of their genes by working to further their siblings' offspring etc etc.

So, Michael strikes pay dirt with "The Birth Famine" and I hope to God it refreshes and strengthens GenXers and Millenials -- comprised of the small cohort of Boomer kids actually born -- for they have their work cut out for them. They must not only preserve our civilization and the society it needs to flourish but they are left the unenviable task of repopulating the former Christendom before our ancestors' incomparable two-thousand years of sacrifice and toil is rendered for naught.

The objective of our public education policies and electronic media programming is to change the behaviour of children so that they become non-reproductive adults. Labels like GenXers and Millenials do not describe what the females of that generation contributed to population growth. These labels describe the relative modernization of one generation to the next, not the success or failure of that population group to replace and grow itself. At least the Boomer label refers to what the females of their parents generation accomplished. It is more accurate to label each generation by the number of women who decide to have no children, only one child, or a large number of children. As the number of childless females increase, each generation moves closer to Generation Zero, which will ultimately result in Population Collapse, or Endangered Species. If we continue on this path, we will be only one natural or man-made disaster from extinction within a short period of time, say less than 200 years. Do your own survey. Notice how many kids each female has, or ask her how many kids does she think she will have. Also pay attention to the roles of women in movies and television. Many roles require she not have any children. Notice what these women are doing during their peak reproductive years. They are involved in fist fights, sword fights, shoot-outs, jumping through plate-glass windows, diving on grenades in battle, and performing high-speed chases on motorcycles. Somehow, opting out of motherhood is viewed as progress and modern thinking. This is what I call Big Brain versus nature paradox or dilemma. Nature says increase your number, go forward and colonize the solar system; but big brain says no, decrease your number and risk extinction from a single famine, drought, pandemic, natural or man-made disaster. We need to get our big brain under control before it destroys us all. This is why nature evolved a high birthrate way before evolving a big brain. If it wasn't for the high potential birthrate of humans, the big brain would not exist.
